Review

Global equity markets took a breather in December after the US Federal Reserve's (Fed) more hawkish comments about future rate cuts. In addition, rising long-term yields started putting pressure on equity valuations. In the context of equity markets overall going down, cyclical and high-growth sectors outperformed, for example, media and entertainment, semiconductors and discretionary retailing. Rate-sensitive real estate and utilities, along with energy and materials, had the worst performance in the period. The JSS - Global Thematic fund outperformed the benchmark during the month. The fund benefitted from a strong performance of its recent additions in the consumer durables space, with Adidas, Deckers and Hermes all up during the period. The fund also benefited from continuous outperformance of ServiceNow in the software space.

Outlook

After the US elections, we observed a strong wave of optimism about the US economic outlook and equity markets, reinforcing the country's market leadership, while other geographies showed a mixed performance. Consumption, in particular, was strong at the end of the year, and we expect this environment to persist in the short term. On a more medium- to long-term perspective, we continue to observe rapid transformations impacting global economies and the broader society. These transformations challenge established players and create tremendous profitable growth opportunities for companies able to benefit from the emergence of new markets. Our strategy targets global thematic opportunities holistically: we believe that the five megathemes of digitalisation, automation, ageing, evolving consumption, and climate change capture the most important changes. The fund focuses on quality companies that are well positioned in the value chain in growth themes, which we think is a source of superior and more durable earnings growth potential.
