Review

After a volatile August, global stock markets were positive in September as investors largely focused on falling inflation and decisions by central banks to reduce interest rates, as well as China's latest monetary and fiscal measures. The Global Thematic fund slightly underperformed the reference index in September. The market was characterised by a change of leadership away from technology that dominated the first half of the year into cyclical sectors supported by rate cuts and China stimulus. ASML was a significant detractor during the month along with the semiconductor equipment market more generally as investors fear greater likelihood of US restrictions on exports to China. The fund benefited from the strong performance of Hermes, a high-end luxury house that was recently added to the portfolio.

Outlook

The current macroeconomic set up combining moderating inflation along with robust labour market and economic activity should encourage sustained consumption levels and earnings growth, a favorable environment for equities. Beyond the short term outlook, we continue to observe a world that is rapidly transforming, challenging established players and creating tremendous profitable growth opportunities for companies that have early detected the right growth trends. Our strategy targets global thematic opportunities holistically, more particularly across the five megathemes of digitalisation, automation, ageing, evolving consumption, and climate change. The fund focuses on quality companies that are well positioned in the value chain of thematic growth trends, which we think as a source of superior and more durable earnings growth potential.
