Review

Central banks started lowering interest rates as economic data indicated softening inflation in the US and Europe. As lower interest rates are beneficial for listed real estate companies, the sector had a solid quarter. Although the real estate investment trust (REIT) subsector still lags the general equity market, the subsector is now positive for the year for date. Solid first-half financial results and cuts to interest rates by central banks resulted in a strong quarter for listed real estate firms. The portfolio returned close to 10% during the period. However, although the absolute return was strong, the portfolio underperformed its benchmark. The underperformance was mainly due to our overweight to Japanese real estate companies. Japan's ruling party's leadership race was won by Shigeru Ishiba. The new prime minister is seen as an advocate for higher interest rates and his win led to a sharp fall in Japanese real estate stocks. On the positive side, our overweight on interest-rate-sensitive real estate companies was favourable, notably German residential companies and Tower REITs.

Outlook

The real estate sector appears to have turned a corner. Operationally, most real estate subsectors have performed relatively well during the last few years, but net asset values have been under pressure. It seems that this has now bottomed out and companies can start rebuilding NAVs in the coming years. A big help for firms would be lower interest rates. Although a lower rate environment has been delayed due to persistent high inflation so far this year, the outlook is improving. Most central banks are expected to have cut rates in the second half of this year, and then into 2025.
