Review

Chinese onshore equities traded range bound in December, diverging between value and growth stocks: the blue-chip CSI 300 returned 0.57%, while the growth style STAR 50/ChiNext retreated 3.70% and 1.83% respectively. The Chinese offshore equities posted a strong rebound, with HSI returning 4.20% in December driven by valuation recovery. To boost economic growth next year, the recent Central Economic Work Conference and Fiscal Work Conference continued to set a pro-growth tone. The fiscal policy has been upgraded from "proactive" to "more proactive," and monetary policy has shifted from "prudent" to "moderately loose", a stance not seen in over a decade. In terms of positioning, we are overweight on industrials, IT and financials, while we are underweight on utilities, communication services, energy, real estate and materials. Our investment in consumer staples, industrials, and materials contributed positively, while IT, healthcare, financials, and consumer discretionary contributed negatively to the excess return.

Outlook

Undoubtedly, policy support and execution set the keynotes in 2025. Although a pro-growth policy stance is widely acknowledged, how fast and how effective the policy stimulus would kick in still bears uncertainties. In terms of portfolio allocation, we will focus on a couple of big themes, in particular, the beneficiaries of policy stimuli: 1) the consumer sector, which stands to benefit from increasing support for consumption, and 2) sectors that benefit from the acceleration of government expenditure and healthier local government balance sheets. The near-term market outlook could be mixed. On one hand, investors may step back to the sidelines when the US presidential inauguration draws near. There may also be profit-taking from themes that have rallied substantially since the end of September 2024. On the other hand, preparations for the early-March “Two Sessions” could spark new anticipations for policy surprises. Therefore, we maintain a balanced portfolio with both defensive and growth plays. We remain overweight on high-quality stocks, while lowering exposure to names that rely heavily on exports.
