Review

During the period under review, China's equity market first rebounded as investors held high expectations for the CCP's Third Plenum in mid-July. Entering the latter half of the month, the Third Plenum outlined the reform plan but lacked immediate and detailed measures, which fell short of investors' expectations. Coupled with the sluggish economy and uncertainties from the US election, the stock market pared some earlier gains, despite the surprise rate cut and the yuan's appreciation. The average daily trading volume contracted due to low sentiment and further tightening on margin trading and securities lending. China's economy has been split between strength in exports and weakness in domestic demand and housing market. Exports posted strong year-on-year growth of 7.6%-8.6% in May/June. Growth of retail sales continued to narrow, as consumers cut back on big-ticket items and premium-priced goods. The Manufacturing PMI slightly edged down to 49.4% in July from 49.5%. The long-awaited Third Plenum was held in mid-July to promote Chinese modernisation.

Outlook

China reported 5% GDP growth in the first half 2024. However, due to soft domestic demand and lingering deflation, we observed slowdown in growth momentum, reflecting by declining GDP growth from 5.3% in 1Q to 4.7% in 2Q. The housing market weakness will remain for some time although the probability of big defaults is getting lower on back of policy easing. We have seen various measures by the regulators to tackle the challenges in different area, including renewal and trade-ins for consumer goods to prop up domestic demand, as well as ETF purchases to boost the stock market. The Third Plenum and the recent Politburo also emphasised the importance for continuity of these policy efforts, and outlined the reform agendas for future growth. We believe that the current valuation of the Chinese equities market has not priced in the economic growth and corporate earnings recovery. We remain constructive about Chinese equities in H2 2024. We forecast the CSI 300 to climb around 10%, thanks to multiple expansion (towards a five-year average) and earnings growth.
