MONTHLY COMMENT

The fund rose in value in May due to US rates falling and credit spreads tightening.

Despite a poor US Treasury auction at the end of the month, bond volatility declined in May. US Treasury yields fell slightly over the month, whereas government bond yields rose slightly in the euro area, reflecting the market's greater confidence in this region's economic outlook.

Corporate bonds rose modestly in May. The credit spreads on high-yield debt fell in the US, and spread tightening was even more noticeable in European high yield.

We slightly increased duration on the euro curve in May. We bought two new issues on the primary market and sold some expensive bonds.

Government bonds could continue to perform well against a backdrop of moderate economic growth and disinflation increasing the likelihood of interest rate cuts. This would also be good news for corporate bond issuers, which are refinancing their existing debt at spreads that are lower than before but still attractive enough to attract substantial investor demand. However, credit risk is ticking up, with the default rate increasing and a higher volume of debt approaching maturity that will need to be refinanced at higher rates. This is why we continue to focus on high-quality issuers.
