Review

Investor expectations that inflation would continue to fall and interest rate rises may end gained traction in July. It was a strong month for European and US real estate investment trusts (REITs). However, China's slow economic growth rate resulted in a weak performance for Hong Kong-listed real estate companies. The first batch of real estate companies published their second-quarter financial results. In general, most of them reported solid figures. The fund's strongest performers were mainly German residential companies. Our holdings in US office and healthcare REITs also contributed positively. Industrial REITs had a good month on the back of the results of Prologis, one of the largest companies of this type. It reported very strong rental growth and virtually no vacancies. Our performance was negatively affected by owning Tower REIT, which performed poorly. It operates communications infrastructure and depends on the spending capacity of tenants such as Verizon and T-Mobile, which have hinted at a slowdown in the amount they plan to invest.

Outlook

Overall, we are becoming more optimistic about the real estate sector, although inflation and interest rates are still too high for the sector to perform well. However, recent economic data has been encouraging. Economists are predicting that interest rate rises could end later this year. Lower inflation and an end to interest rate rises should bode well for the real estate sector, which has historically fared very well in such an environment. Most segments of the real estate sector, perhaps with the exception of the office and retail areas, are performing well with high rental growth and low vacancy levels. The sector as a whole appears to be undervalued.
