Review

US equities continued to advance in July, driven by a notable rebound in cyclicals and commodities. As a result, the strongest performing sector was energy. The weakest performing sectors were healthcare, real estate and consumer staples, the more defensive segments of the US equity market. Fund performance was slightly behind the benchmark last month. Our style and industry allocation had a slightly negative impact on performance as momentum underperformed, while our underweight in auto explains most of the detraction in the industry allocation. Stock selection was positive as Carrier Global performed well on the back of good earnings. Carrier Global and our Underweight in Tesla were the best stock selection performance contributors, while our underweight in Nvidia and Calix were the largest performance detractors last month.

Outlook

The US economy continues to surprise to the upside as most economic releases have been better than expected. In fact, the strong rebound in the Citi Economic Surprise index since the middle of May correlates well with the robust recovery we have seen in the same time frame for the various US equity indices. There is now a sense that the US can avoid a recession, and market participants have become more positive. Rather than trying to anticipate the next economic shift, we prefer to maintain a balanced stance. This kept us more involved than what we might have been comfortable with last year when economic surprises were falling, and it keeps us from getting too excited now.
